The International Studio & Curatorial Program announces Concrete Truth: Art and the Documentary, an exhibition that considers vital questions around fact and image-making. The exhibition presents recent lens-based works positioned at the boundary of art and the documentary.

During the last two decades, visual artists have revitalized documentary practices, facilitated by new media technologies and modes of circulation. Documentary approaches help us bear witness to both individual and collective realities, often using found footage, biographical narratives, textual documents, and historic reenactments.

The artists in Concrete Truth respond to times of crisis by interweaving documentary practices, aesthetics and ethics. Several artists in the exhibition employ documentary formats as a strategy to construct counter-narratives, in works that deal with a range of concerns including the histories of Indigenous peoples, the role of media in political conflict, internet ethics, the abuse of governmental power, and archives and copyright issues.

Concrete Truth: Art and the Documentary takes stock of documentary art work produced in the last few years, and highlights the various ways artists represent political and social realities in an age of global disinformation. Among the works on view will be a video by Krista Belle Stewart that combines 1960s documentary footage of the artist's mother at the beginning of her career as British Columbia's first Aboriginal public health nurse with her mother's recent testimonies of the trauma she endured in an Indian Residential School. Current ISCP resident Paolo Cirio's installation obfuscates the 15 million mugshots made public on internet databases for corporate profit. Photographs of the independence ceremonies of Asian and African nations are the subject of Maryam Jafri's work, specifically looking at the ways these images have been illegally copyrighted by stock agencies and digitally "colonized." Using landscape as a sign of the political climate, Eric Baudelaire traces the story of a young man from his troubled home in the Parisian suburbs to Syria, where he joins ISIS. Edgardo Aragón's critical cartography and video of everyday conditions in Cachimbo, Mexico, demonstrates the crippling effects of foreign power. The amnesia of both public and personal memory—framed by a bombardment of contentious media images in Turkish politics—shapes belit sağ's activist artwork.

Concrete Truth will be accompanied by public programs including a conversation between Paolo Cirio and Julia Powles in December and a lecture by Krista Belle Stewart in early 2018, among other events.

This exhibition is curated by Kari Conte, Director of Programs and Exhibitions.
